

FINITUDE, ETERNITY, LOVE, THE GOOD & MARTIN HÄGGLUND'S THIS LIFE

GREG RESTALL • UNIVERSITY OF ST ANDREWS | LOGOS SEMINAR HANDOUT • NOVEMBER 2023

ABSTRACT: Martin Hägglund's This Life: Secular Faith and Spiritual Freedom (Knopf, 2019) is an important and insightful treatise on metaphysics, philosophical anthropology, and political philosophy. It is also a trenchant critique of a religious orientation to the world. In this talk I reflect on Hägglund's account of value and our finitude, paying special attention to his criticism of one of his targets, the political theology of Martin Luther King, Jr. According to Hägglund, King's appeal to God when elaborating the need for justice would better be replaced by an appeal to our own communal norms. To defer to God is at best, a colourful way of depicting our own commitments, and at worst, an appeal to God's providence has no determinate content, but which nonetheless threatens to absolve us of the hard work of making justice in the here and now. ¶ I aim to show that while Hägglund's account is a salutary corrective to a pervasive kind of bad faith, his criticism goes only so far. Any identification of God's justice with our communal norms, or of truth with our best theory, is to mischaracterise the roles these concepts play for us. They function as ideals that direct our attention outside ourselves and beyond our own conceptions, in the same way that love takes us outside ourselves and orients us toward an other. Hägglund's account, therefore, points us to the crucial concept of dependence, but I will argue that when we reflect on the notion of dependence, we will see that it can be understood in more than one way, and that secular faith can be compatible with a religious orientation toward the infinite.

❖ THIS LIFE: SECULAR FAITH & SPIRITUAL FREEDOM

Two concepts play a central role in Hägglund's This Life.

FINITUDE:

To be finite means primarily two things: to be dependent on others, and to live in relation to death. I am finite because I cannot maintain my life on my own, and because I will die. Likewise, the projects to which I am devoted are finite because they live only through the efforts of those who are committed to them and will cease to be if they are abandoned. [TL, p. 4]¹

and, SECULAR FAITH:

The sense of finitude—the sense of the ultimate fragility of everything we care about—is at the heart of what I call secular faith. To have secular faith is to be devoted to a life that will end, to be dedicated to projects that can fail or break down. [p. 5, 6]

I call it secular faith because it is devoted to a form of life that is bounded by time. In accordance with the meaning of the Latin word saecularis, to have secular faith is to be dedicated to persons or projects that are worldly and temporal. Secular faith is the form of faith that we all sustain in caring for someone or something that is vulnerable to loss. [p. 6]

For MH, secular faith has a competitor: RELIGIOUS FAITH.

In contrast, the common denominator for what I call religious forms of faith is a devaluation of our finite lives as a lower form of being. All world religions (Hinduism, Buddhism, Judaism, Islam, and Christianity) hold that the highest form of existence or the most desirable form of life is eternal rather than finite. To be religious—or to adopt a religious perspective on life—is to regard our finitude as a lack, an illusion, or a fallen state of being. [p. 6]

MH describes the life of secular faith in this way:

When we own our secular faith, we acknowledge that the object of our faith—our spiritual cause—is dependent on our practice of faith. The practice of faith is our practical identity (e.g., political activist) and the object of faith is our spiritual cause (e.g., our political cause). [p. 373]

For MH, choice has true weight only when we recognise that our life is finite.

...what I do with my time can matter to me only because I grasp my life as finite. If I believed that I had an infinite time to live, the urgency of doing anything would be unintelligible to me and no normative obligation could have any grip on me. [p. 191-192]

Religious faith and secular faith are in tension:

[W]hat I call religious faith disowns our secular faith. Religious faith takes the object of faith to be a god ... that is independent of our practice of faith. Our spiritual cause is treated as though it were a being that commands and has power over us without being dependent on us. This is the type of faith that King espouses in his religious sermons. [p. 373]

There are (at least) two different ways the notion of finitude as lack can be articulated.

FINITUDE-AS-ILLUSION: There is no genuine loss or risk for those whose life is meaningful, since God (or a right relationship with reality, etc.) has secured your eternal destiny; the sufferings of this contingent world are of no real significance. They are, at most, are illusions to be transcended. A finite life, on its own is meaningless. Life has meaning only if it is ongoing, or if this finite world is transcended.

FINITUDE-AS-INCLUSION: A finite life is incomplete on its own. A finite contingent life exists inside the infinite, and the contingencies of this world can only be properly understood in the enclosing context of the non-contingent. Finite life involves genuine loss and risk, and this finite life has value, but this value can only be properly understood by way of its relationship to a non-contingent infinite other, which is in some sense beyond us.

Conclusion 1: FINITUDE-AS-ILLUSION and FINITUDE-AS-INCLUSION are two distinct ways in which the finitude of life can be understood in a religious orientation to the world. Finitude-as-illusion is inconsistent with secular faith as MH understands it, but it is by no means clear that finitude-as-inclusion is inconsistent with secular faith.

❖ HÄGGLUND'S CRITIQUE/ANALYSIS OF MLK

MH on God-talk in MLK's rhetoric and preaching:

In his role as a Christian preacher, King claims that "the universe is guided by a benign Intelligence whose infinite love embraces all mankind," namely, "the one eternal God" who has "strength to protect us" with his "unlimited resources" and on whose grace we depend. [p. 373]

MH on MLK's religious epistemology:

[T]he supposed relation between God and our emancipation becomes incomprehensible. What we take to be evil and unjust can be part of God's

¹ All citations in [brackets] are to This Life (Knopf 2019). Abbreviations: MH = Martin Hägglund; MLK = Martin Luther King, Jr.

“plan” or his unfathomable “purposes,” which purportedly redeem what happens to us beyond anything we can understand. Moreover, if God is beyond our comprehension, his notion of goodness and justice can be completely at odds with our own. As King avows in one of his religious sermons, “I do not pretend to understand all of the ways of God or his particular timetable for grappling with evil.” [p. 373, 374]

MH’s appeal to Hegel as a way to reinterpret God talk:

The command or the will of God only makes sense if we understand the term in a Hegelian way. “God” is a name for the communal norms that we have legislated to ourselves and to which we hold ourselves. When King invokes the will and the command of God in his political speeches, he is reminding us of what we are committed to in being committed to social freedom for all. [p. 375]

So for MH, MLK’s appeals to God are, best understood, underneath it all, appeals to what we² are committed to—our own self-legislated ideals.

- The Hegelian reinterpretation of religious vocabulary has its virtues.
- The reinterpretation has a different modal status than the original vocabulary.
- MLK’s epistemic modesty is not to be confused with a severe apophaticism.

Conclusion 2: The Hegelian reinterpretation of God-talk obscures the fallibility of our own commitments. To take God to be incomprehensible does not mean we cannot speak truly of God.

❖ LOVE, THE LOVER & THE BELOVED

- The triad of lover, beloved and the lovers’ idea of the beloved.
- The triad of thinker, world and the thinker’s view of the world.
- The triad of activist, God’s justice, and the norms to which we commit ourselves.
- To orient yourself toward the beloved (the world, or God’s justice) is to be directed outward, while to talk of the idea of the beloved (our theory of the world, or the norms to which we’ve bound ourselves) remains self-involved.
- There are two different ways in which there is a dependence relation between x and the idea of x.

Conclusion 3: While the Hegelian substitution does not work on its own, there is a two-way relationship between our conceptions and their targets. The beloved is (ideally) the source and norm of the idea of the beloved. The idea of the beloved orients the lover toward the beloved.

❖ FACETS OF DEPENDENCE & INDEPENDENCE

- The case of the obsessive mathematician: when the object of our devotion does not depend on our action.
- The case of the religious believer, committed to social action out of devotion to God.
- This counts as secular faith, by the text of MH’s definition.
- Dependence is subtle in the case of social action. The ends depend on the actions of a large number of people, but often, no individual person is necessary for the action to succeed.

- This need not demotivate action: the action does not depend on me in the counterfactual sense, but it does depend on me in the constituting sense (my involvement helps constitute the social end as a the event that it actually is).

Conclusion 4: MH’s concept of secular faith—for which the goal depends on our own action—can be understood in more than one way. In the case of a collective social action (whether a socialist revolution or the coming of the Kingdom of God as a social reality) the outcome may depend on my individual action in the sense that it helps constitute the action in the form that it actually takes, while it might not be counterfactually necessary, in that the end may obtain whether I take part or not.

❖ RISK, SAFETY & DEPENDENCE

- Question: are we not infantilised, on MLK’s account? Our actions matter, but only so far. We operate only within the enclosing necessity of God’s constraints.

- On this view, loss is possible, but only in a limited way. There is no abject loss.

...what I do with my time can matter to me only because I grasp my life as finite. If I believed that I had an infinite time to live, the urgency of doing anything would be unintelligible to me and no normative obligation could have any grip on me. [p. 191-192]

- This view misdescribes the significance of choice in a finite world. Our choices are not between fungible options, even when our time is infinite. Choices have significance even if the horizon of our death is not in view, as with a child.
- Not every option can be deferred indefinitely.
- Transient events have unchanging, everlasting shadows.

Conclusion 5: MH’s kind of secular faith (which takes there to be value in a life bound by time, and contingent on goals that can fail) is consistent with a religious commitment to a God upon whom we depend, but who does not depend upon us, and with a concomitant commitment to work towards risky finite social ends that have value in themselves. Our finite, contingent and dependent lives may have value, and the commitments we undertake can be sustained by faith in a God upon whom we depend.

❖ REFERENCES

- Brandom, Robert (2002) Tales of the Mighty Dead: historical essays in the metaphysics of intentionality. Harvard UP.
- Della Torre II, Frank (2023) “Mediating Feuerbach and Barth: Bonhoeffer’s This-Worldly Theology” Scottish Journal of Theology 1–15. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0036930623000364>
- Douglas, Alexander (2020) “The Goods of the Earthly City”, The Philosopher, Summer 2020. <https://www.thephilosopher1923.org/post/the-goods-of-the-earthly-city>
- Hägglund, Martin (2019) This Life: Secular Faith and Spiritual Freedom. Knopf.

Greg Restall: Philosophy Department, The University of St Andrews
<https://consequently.org> • gr69@st-andrews.ac.uk

² Space does not permit me to examine the scope of the “we” in such a claim. Is this humanity at its widest breadth? Or the African-American community at the core of MLK’s movement? How are the boundaries of the political “we” to be understood?